Even though Tito's family has always been involved in fishing, he didn't understand this practice
until his grandfather took him on a fishing trip.

There, he helped his grandfather drag
a canoe out to the ocean. Tito loved the sea.

They went deep into the shore. Once there, as his grandfather threw a net into the water, Tito saw how
--little by little-- the net filled with fish. He saw the fish crashing into each other as they struggled to escape from the net, but the boy
knew it was in vain.

When he returned home, he continued to watch his family's work closely. The boy knew how relevant the work was for the household.

He also understood that it was a very common occupation around the place.

But seeing the fish fighting against their destiny triggered a little voice in his head.

It was the memory inside a school class.

Tito remembered that the teacher had spoken about how the fish were becoming scarce because of irresponsible fishing and that it was causing an increasing problem for the planet.

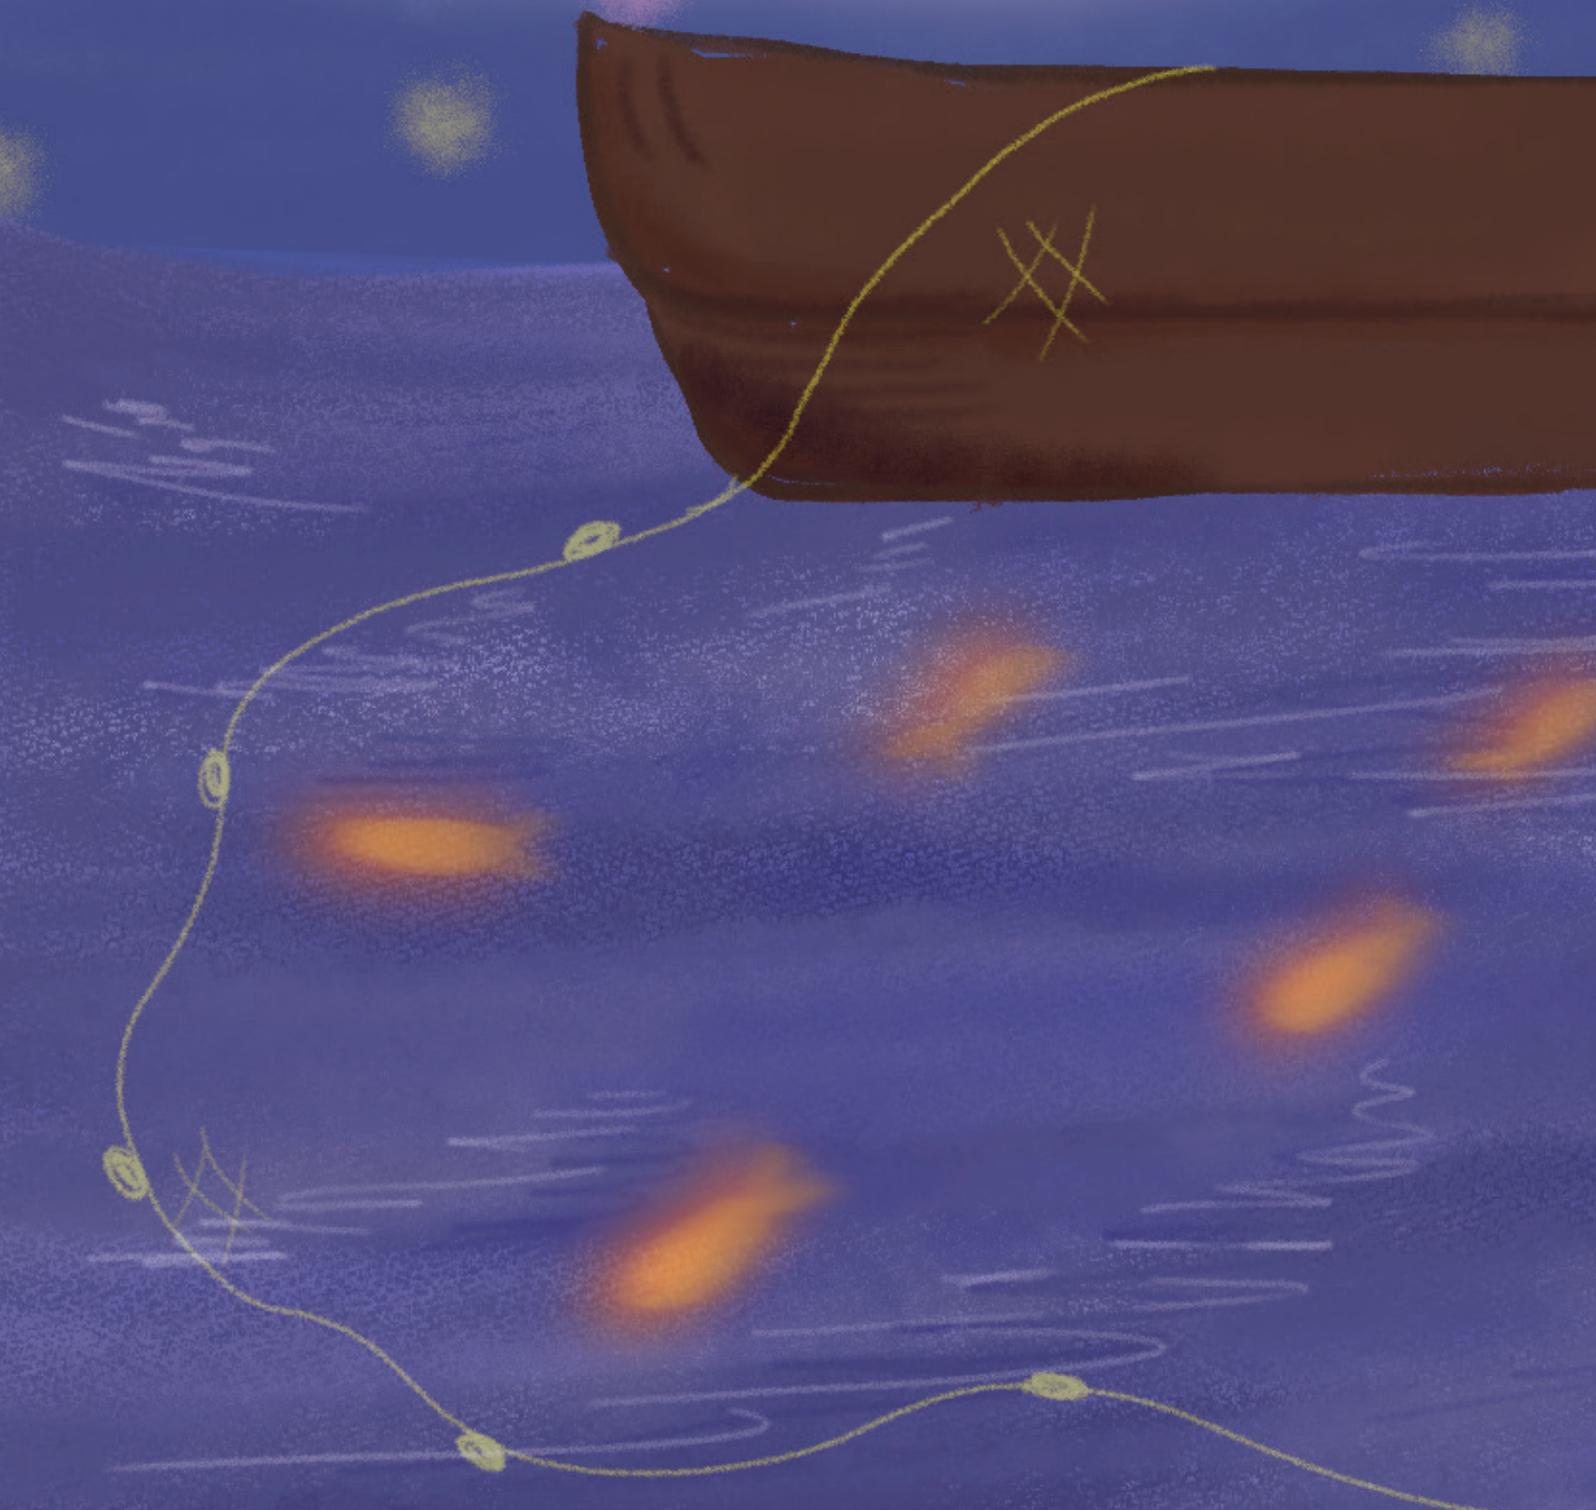

One day, without thinking it twice, and as soon as his grandfather got a little distracted, the boy grabbed as many fish as he could and ran to the beach. If everyone had the right to life, that included the fish, he thought. He went into the sea and, after he had released them, told the fish he could not always do this, because his family had to earn a living; but he would help them by not eating fish any longer. He took his promise so seriously that he tried to promote the idea among his school friends.

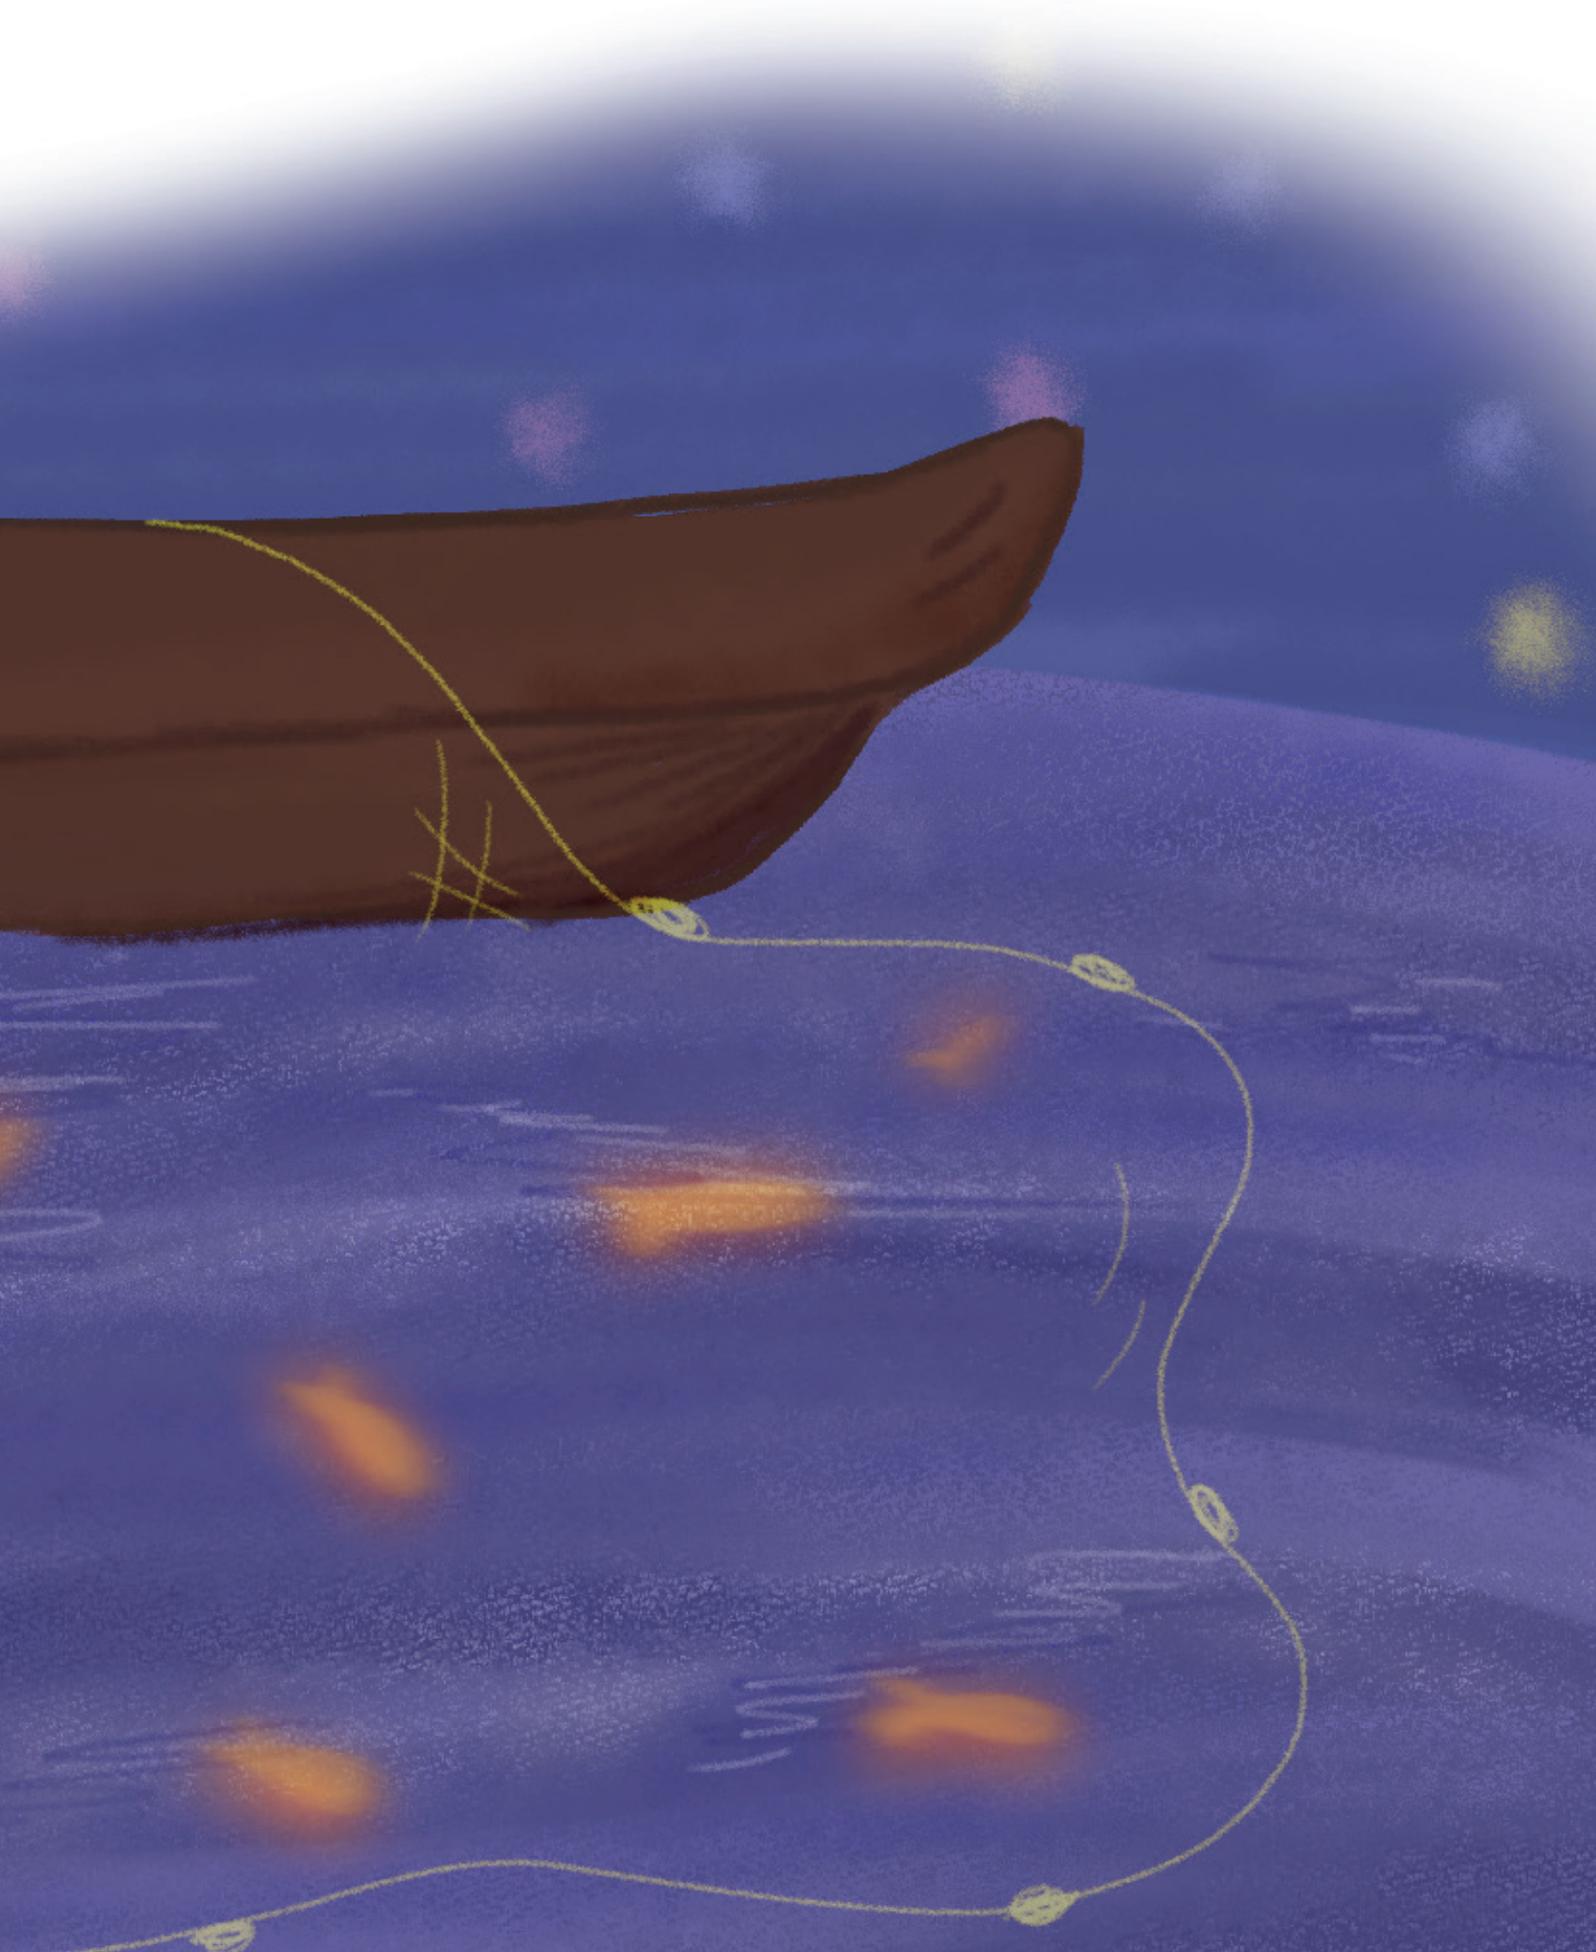

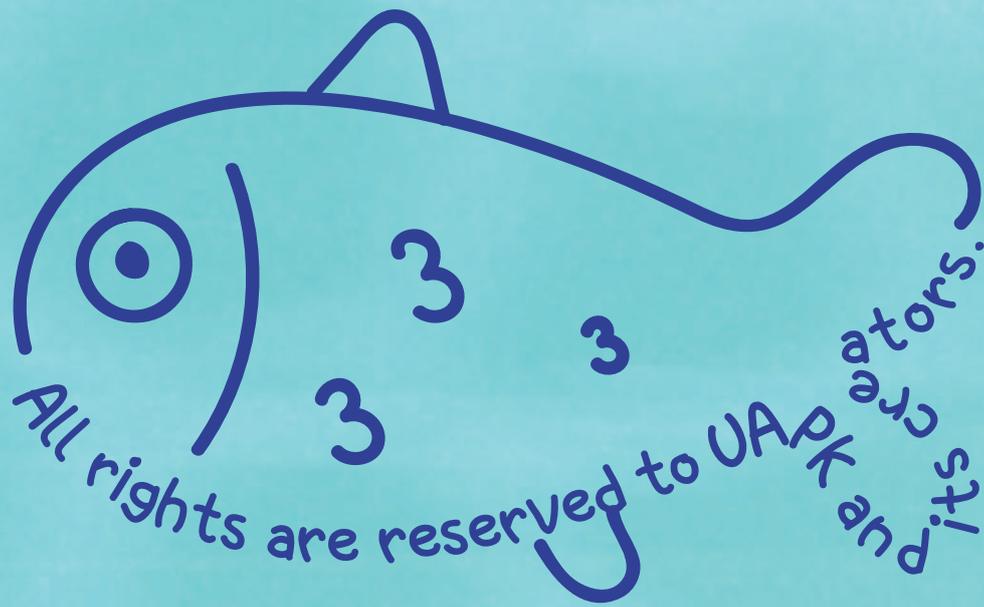

After many years, when his grandfather was no longer
He would take the fish out of the sea, bring them home
and sell them.

But he kept his promise and never ate a single fish again.

er around, it was his turn to go fishing.
